Update from the OKCA Board

We're happy to announce our Club Knife for 2024 will be a tribute knife to Wayne Goddard. Steve Goddard brought his collection of blanks to a board meeting and this design was selected. Mike Vellekamp will be making the knives. There will be 107 made. Prototype 1 and Prototype 2 will be prizes in a drawing. To be eligible for this drawing you will have to have renewed your 2024 membership by February 15th 2024. If you're a table holder, you'll have a second chance to win prototype 2 if you register for your table by February 15th, 2024.

Numbers 1-5 will be entered into the silent auction at the April show, they will be butterscotch micarta with nickel silver pins.

Number 6-105 will be available for presales after the new year. These will be green micarta with copper pins.

We will be holding a rope cutting competition at the upcoming show. Requirements of the knife to be entered are a 10-14 inch blade with a lanyard hole in the middle of the handle.

We are going to have two Raffle categories at the show this year. The first being, "Win a day with a Knifemaker" this raffle is for club members who would like a day with a knife maker to learn how to make a knife from beginning to end. Four winners will be selected. $25 per ticket.

The second raffle will be for club members who are knifemakers who would like to turn their hobby of knife making into a business.

They will win a 2 hour Zoom class with Ray Ellingsen who will consult on how to make a business of your knife hobby. Ray has been consulting with small business owners for years and if you know Ray Ellingsen, you also know he's been running around the show since he was 11 years old. A great combination to help boost your small knife business to the next level no matter where you're at currently.

Theater Knives my Dad made

By Mike Johnston

I have always been interested in history. History of weapons especially peak my interest. When family history and weapons history merge, so much the better.

My father was a B-17 pilot during WWII. During one of his missions his plane was shot down and he and his crew successfully bailed out. They were over Holland when they were shot down and were located and hidden by the Dutch Underground. Dad said one of the first things the underground did was take away everything dad and his crew had that identified them as American airmen. Dad said he regretted losing his 1911 .45 made by Singer Sewing Machine, but he got over it (sort of).

While he was hiding in a barn, dad acquired a couple power hacksaw blade and a file. He had decided he and his crew needed some sort of weapons, so he made several knives that he said were similar to the style the Dutch carried everyday. He carved and fitted the handles and wooden sheaths by hand and gave them to the crew members.

(Dad's knife he made in Holland)

Three months later, dad returned to England with his knife that he made.

In the late 80's or early 90's, one of his former crew members contacted dad and asked if he (knife sent by crew member to Dad) remembered the knife dad had made him while they were evading capture by the Germans during WWII. Of course dad remembered and the crewman sent dad the knife.

After returning to the United States, dad was stationed in Honolulu Hawaii while the pacific theater was still active. He made several knives from military aircraft parts, plexiglass windshields and red light covers and pieces of aluminum.

(Dad carried this dagger in the top of his jump boots while flying for many years.)

He said some were from Japanese planes and some from American planes. Dad said the blades were from power planer blades he salvaged from the workshop on base.

Dad was able to take his family, my mother and oldest sister to Hawaii, where my other sister was born. The second, much smaller dagger, he made for my mother and put her initials on the sheath. The cross guard is plexiglass as is most of the handle.

This blade has a fine, even coat of rust so it may not have been made with a planer blade.

(Dad made this knife for my mother)

(Dad's hunting knife)

The third is a hunting knife he made at the same time. This was the only hunting knife I ever knew dad to carry and use. The power planer blades he used held an edge and this one is sharp to this day.

The Knife that Came Back Part II

By Ray Ellingsen

(In Part 1, I attended a two week wilderness survival course and borrowed a Herter's knife from my instructor after my high speed, low drag Rambo knife got snapped in half. I reluctantly returned my instructor's knife to him after the class was over, and thought I'd never see it again. Thirty years later the same knife crossed my path again)

Part 2

I looked at the Ebay seller's information and discovered that the man who sold me the Herter's knife was in Wisconsin. I was determined to solve the mystery of how this knife had traveled from Oregon to Wisconsin over a period of thirty years. I contacted the seller, and after several correspondences discovered that Bill, the seller, had bought the knife at a local pawn shop for his son who was shipping out with the Army to Iraq. Apparently, Bill's son was as unimpressed as I originally was when he saw the knife and opted for some high speed, low drag combat knife instead (I hope it wasn't a United Cutlery Rambo knife).

Bill gave me the number for the pawn shop and I called them that day. Of course, the pawn shop owner, Jim M. (I won't disclose the last name of the owner in order to protect the guilty), had no recollection of the knife, or where he might have gotten it. I was ready to hang up when the owner's last name rattled an old memory in my mind. I asked if he knew someone named Terry with his same last name, and Jim said that was his son. I had gone through numerous Outward Bound courses with Terry M. over the years.

When I called Terry M., I immediately remembered why we never stayed in touch. He was clearly the same jerk I remembered him to be. When I asked him how he came to possess the knife he said he couldn't remember, and didn't seem too bothered that he was a rotten, decrepit thief who had stolen a valuable, precious knife and had deprived countless students of having a quality cutting tool to learn with (he probably just innocently borrowed the knife and forget to give it back after a class). Regardless of what really transpired I decided to believe the worst. I hung up, cursing him, his lineage, his pets, and anyone else who may have been related to him.

All of my ire was quickly forgotten when I remembered Ross, and all of the skills he had taught me with that Herter's knife, now in my possession. I looked up Ross, and discovered that he was living out in the middle of nowhere in Oregon. It took me a week to get a message to him, but we finally caught up and agreed to meet in a little café in Joseph, OR.

I hadn't seen Ross in over two decades. He looked older, but still quietly alert. We sat down and ordered our meal, and while we were waiting, I pulled out the Herter's knife and slid it across the table to him. Ross looked at it for a minute, then picked it up and examined it. He turned the sheath over and smiled when he saw his initials. He set it back down and waited patiently for me to tell him the story. I recalled to him my experience of reacquiring the knife, and then told him that I wanted to return his knife to him. Ross thought about it and then slid the knife back across the table to me saying,

"It's yours now. Take care of it...and, just a suggestion, but I wouldn't loan it out to anybody if I were you".

As I sat there in the diner, I had the fleeting thought that "if Ross had just sold me that knife all those years ago, none of this would have happened. Then it hit me, if Ross had just SOLD me that knife all those years ago, none of this WOULD have happened; I wouldn't have wondered about that knife over the decades, I wouldn't have started collecting Herter's knives and catalogs, I wouldn't have had the experience of winning that knife in an Ebay auction and discovering that it was the same knife from all those years ago, I wouldn't have embarked on the Scooby Doo mystery of finding out how it wound up in Wisconsin, I wouldn't have had the conversation with Terry M. about him absconding with Ross's knife (well, that I could have lived without), I wouldn't have visited with Ross again, and I certainly wouldn't be writing this article.

Ross passed away peacefully in his sleep a year after we met on that day. As I am typing this, his Herter's knife (now in my care) sits on my desk in front of me. I am grateful that I was able to reconnect with Ross one last time. I am also in awe by all of the experiences that we have in life, and the tangible things that are connected to them.

Years ago, a young man had a profound wilderness experience with a knife that shaped his future. That time, and that knife, faded into distant memory. But then one day, the knife came back.

December 15th they might not get their same table they had last year.
